the investigations of the Bureau of Mines, it is shown that the United States has the greatest known supply of radium-bearing ores in the world, not one gram has been produced here.

"The United States today is in the humilitating position of being forced to purchase at extravagant prices from abroad such radium as its hospitals and physicians can afford for experimental purposes, while we have been supplying the ores from which it is made." said Charles L. Parsons, chief of the Division of Mineral Technology of the bureau. "We have paid Europe's prices for what we could get in order to investigate the wonderful properties of radium and their possible application to the eradication of disease. It is needless to say that we have been greatly hampered in our work by the almost prohibitive prices at which the radium has been held.

"Several months ago, runnors reached."

"Several months ago, rumors reached the Bureau of Mines, that in Colorado there had been an increased demand for cornotite, the radium carrying orer, and that this ore was being shipped abroad in considerable quantity. It was also rethat this ore was being shipped abroad in considerable quantity. It was also reported that the Europeans were insisting upon only the highest grades of these ores and that a great amount of lower grade ores was practically being wasted. R. B. Moore and K.
